Our librarians at SCC make it possible for me to encourage student learning about history beyond the classroom. In addition to helping students explore topics that encourage interest in our past and future, the library staff is active in developing collections and databases that inspire student research. Their work also allows me to engage students in historical methodology—the librarians help me to teach students how to find information, to analyze and synthesize it, and to broaden their awareness and understanding. I consider the library to be an essential partner in my efforts as a historian and educator.

Librarians at the Emerson College library have been a consistent source of valuable advice and expertise for my students and for me. I've incorporated library instruction sessions focused on theater research methods into my syllabi and have depended upon the library archives department to help students learn how to do more in-depth archival studies. To me, a great challenge is that in this Internet age students seem far less familiar with libraries now, so the wonderful services provided by Emerson librarians are doubly valuable.

Great library staffs make great libraries. Ours has been recognized nationally as a leader in the creative use of information technology to support students, educators, and researchers. The virtual library it provides to the worldwide particle physics community levels the scientific playing field by providing equal instantaneous access to the field's research everywhere there is a PC and an Internet connection. The library's databases and services are at the forefront of technological innovation. Over the years its cutting-edge systems and services have helped transform the way we do research in our field.
