CLOSE THE DIGITAL DIVIDE, PROTECT THE LIFELINE PROGRAM
WC Docket Nos. 17-287, 11-42, 09-197

Dear Chairman Pai:

On behalf of The Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights and the 200 undersigned organizations that work directly with and advocate for low-income people, people of color, seniors, families struggling to find housing, people with disabilities, residents of rural areas, veterans, victims of domestic violence, health care providers, educators, and students, we urge you to reject the Federal Communications Commission’s (FCC’s) new proposals that will debilitate the Lifeline program, the only federal program targeted at assisting low-income households with the cost of broadband and telephone service. Each of our organizations knows broadband Internet access is a vital tool that remains elusive for our diverse communities. Telephone access is similarly essential and costly. We urge you, as a chairman who asserts his highest priority is closing the digital divide, to make good on that promise and bolster, not undermine, the Lifeline program.

The Lifeline program is a public-private partnership created in 1985 during the Reagan administration to help defray the cost of communications for low-income households. Lifeline leverages competition to permit consumers to choose among participating carriers and to select among approved voice-only service plans, broadband-only service plans, or bundled voice and data service plans from wireline or wireless companies. As of last year, Lifeline assisted more than 12 million participants, at least 6.5 million of whom are receiving broadband after the FCC modernized the program to include broadband. As such, the Lifeline program is targeted to assist low-income people with the most significant barrier to connectivity – cost.

The proposals issued by the Federal Communications Commission would gut this critical program by taking steps to:

- eliminate service for approximately 70 percent of current participants, particularly mobile services;
- restrict voice service support to only low-income households in rural areas; and
- overlay existing means-testing and program integrity measures with ineffective and administratively complex budgetary limits and mandatory co-pays, which will hurt our country’s most economically fragile households.
We urge the Commission to heed these four points:

1. Keep the focus of Lifeline on people, not networks. The proposal to eliminate carriers following particular business models (such as resellers) will result in cutting off approximately 70 percent of all current Lifeline participants. Other carriers that are not resellers have been exiting the Lifeline program and have shown no ability or interest in stepping in to serve low-income families. The FCC erroneously justifies these proposals by arguing they are needed to promote broadband infrastructure in rural areas, ignoring its own $4.5 billion rural program targeted for this goal. These programs are complementary: one aims to spur deployment to rural areas, while the Lifeline program ensures low-income people in rural and urban areas can afford service. Redirecting Lifeline to support infrastructure will leave low-income households with no support.

2. Protect Lifeline voice service for all consumers. The FCC is proposing to support subsidized voice services in rural areas, but not in urban areas. All low-income households should be free to choose voice services. Most current Lifeline consumers have a voice/data bundle. Voice service is critical for access to 911 emergency services. An entire community benefits when everyone can report criminal activity, fires, or other emergency conditions.

3. Rationing Lifeline hurts the poor and hurts the country. The FCC proposes to cap the size of the Lifeline program and contemplates a complex administrative process to prioritize eligible households. The Commission has also raised the possibility of placing a lifetime cap on an individual Lifeline recipient’s support. Neither of these proposals address program integrity, and both create unpredictability for low-income people who might languish on wait-lists to receive connectivity at a time of urgent need, or as senior citizens and others use up their Lifeline benefit and are forced to purchase at market rates. Moreover, unable to ascertain whether they will continue to receive predictable revenue, the few remaining carriers will likely exit. Such a proposal is cruel and administratively burdensome to no purpose – the Lifeline program is available only to eligible low-income households and in 2015 the FCC adopted augmented program integrity measures, which are being implemented right now. A better means to ensure efficient use of Lifeline dollars would be to continue the 2016 reforms that maximized the number of companies participating in Lifeline.

4. Mandating a co-pay for Lifeline will eliminate the most popular Lifeline service that helps some of the most vulnerable low-income consumers. The current Lifeline program is technology-neutral and companies can develop new Lifeline service packages as long as they meet FCC-imposed minimum standards. The new FCC proposal would use a heavy hand to eliminate the Lifeline services that are the most popular in the marketplace, such as products that offer a price point identical to the federal subsidy and thus do not require payment by the consumer. These products are ideal for the most economically fragile subscribers because they do not require a deposit, a credit check, late fees, or a checking account or some other means to make a monthly payment. If these proposals are adopted, homeless veterans, domestic violence victims, victims of natural disasters, and many others would be left without assistance.
We strongly oppose the proposed changes, which would exacerbate the digital divide and devastate families enrolled in Lifeline. Each of our organizations has seen the positive impact of fixed and mobile telephone service and broadband connections. Access to broadband and telephone enables access to education and job opportunities, invaluable health information, and social services. Broadband is essential for any child or adult who goes to school or seeks to further enhance their skills. We urge you to reject the FCC’s new proposals on Lifeline and stand by the low-income people of this country.

Sincerely,

The Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights
