Researchers across a broad spectrum of academic disciplines rely on data that is collected, processed, and disseminated by governments at all levels. For those new to supporting research with government data, the repositories providing access to these resources can be as mysterious as a sealed car engine. Join GODORT as we take a look inside government data distribution centers to see what makes them tick.

Committee Chair: Stephen Woods

The Federal Depository Library Program's selective and regional depositories are facing challenges collecting, maintaining and preserving their historic collections of government publications. Challenges include re-purposing library space, fugitive publications and lack comprehensive data management plans. The Federal Information Preservation Network is being developed by the Government Publications Office to address issues inhibiting preservation/access nationwide. This program will investigate how preservation experts and depository librarians can partner to meet the goals of Federal Information Preservation Network in ensuring the longevity of these historic collections. Co-Sponsored by ALA Government Documents Round Table (GODORT), Program Committee.
